Cities break low-temperature records; brutal freeze grips much of US as 2018 begins

Millions of Americans shivered their way into 2018 as a huge swath of the nation faced brutally cold conditions Monday.

Freezing temperatures spread as far south as the Gulf Coast and South Texas, and record lows were set in parts of the Plains and Midwest.

Wind chills, meanwhile, spiked down to 40 below zero in some spots, posing health concerns and canceling New Year's Day events, though organizers trudged ahead with plans where they could.

While spots like Des Moines, Iowa, and Aberdeen, South Dakota, recorded morning lows Monday of 20 and 32 degrees below zero, people in Asheville, North Carolina, faced dangerous travel conditions from slick, icy roads.

Low temperatures are forecast to linger across much of the East Coast, Midwest and South in the coming days.
